The materials included in these files are intended for non-commercial use by AP teachers for course and exam preparation; permission for any other use must be sought from the Advanced Placement Program. Teachers may reproduce them, in whole or in part, in limited quantities, for face-to-face teaching purposes but may not mass distribute the materials, electronically or otherwise. These materials and any copies made of them may not be resold, and the copyright notices must be retained as they appear here. This permission does not apply to any third-party copyrights contained herein.
At the AP Reading, faculty consultants were given the following General Directions:

The score you assign should reflect your judgment of the quality of the essay as a whole. Reward the writers for what they do well. The score for an exceptionally well-written essay may be raised by one point from the score otherwise appropriate. In no case may a poorly written essay be scored higher than 3.

These well-conceived and well-ordered essays provide insightful analysis (implicit as well as explicit) of how Heaney creates and conveys his memory of picking blackberries. They appreciate Heaney's physically-intense language for its vivid literal description, but they also understand the meaning of the experience on a profound, metaphoric level. Although the writers of these essays may offer a range of interpretations and/or choose different poetic elements for emphasis, these papers provide convincing readings of the poem and maintain consistent control over the elements of effective composition, including the language unique to the criticism of verse. Their textual references are apt and specific. Though they may not be error-free, they demonstrate the writers' ability to read poetry perceptively and to write with clarity and sophistication.

These essays reflect a sound grasp of Heaney's poem and the power of its language; but they prove less sensitive than the best essays to the poetic ways that Heaney invests literal experience with strong, metaphoric implications. The interpretations of the poem that they provide may falter in some particulars or they may be less thorough or precise in their discussion of how the speaker reveals the experience of "blackberry-picking." Nonetheless, their dependence on paraphrase, if any, will be in the service of analysis. These essays demonstrate the writers' ability to express ideas clearly, but they do not exhibit the same level of mastery, maturity, and/or control as the very best essays. These essays are likely to be briefer, less incisive, and less well-supported than the 9-8 papers.

These essays are, at best, superficial. They respond to the assigned task yet probably say little beyond the most easily grasped observations. Their analysis of how the experience of blackberry picking is conveyed may be vague, formulaic, or inadequately supported. They may suffer from the cumulative force of many minor misreadings. They tend to rely on paraphrase but nonetheless paraphrase which contains some implicit analysis. Composition skills are at a level sufficient to convey the writer's thoughts, and egregious mechanical errors do not constitute a distraction. These essays are nonetheless not as well-conceived, organized, or developed as upper-half papers.
Question 1 (cont.)

These lower-half essays reveal an incomplete understanding of the poem and perhaps an insufficient understanding of the prescribed task as well: they may emphasize literal description without discussing the deeper implications of the blackberry-picking experience. The analysis may be partial, unconvincing, or irrelevant—or it may rely essentially on paraphrase. Evidence from the text may be meager or misconstrued. The writing demonstrates uncertain control over the elements of composition, often exhibiting recurrent stylistic flaws and/or inadequate development of ideas. Essays scored 3 may contain significant misreading and/or unusually inept writing.

These essays compound the weaknesses of the papers in the 4-3 range. They may seriously misread the poem. Frequently, they are unacceptably brief. They are poorly written on several counts and may contain many distracting errors in grammar and mechanics.

2-1: Although some attempt may have been made to respond to the question, the writer's assertions are presented with little clarity, organization, or support from the text of the poem.

0: A response with no more than a reference to the task.

— Indicates a blank response or one that is completely off topic.
In Seamus Heaney's poem "Blackberry Picking," the use of juicy diction, clear and vivid imagery, slant rhyme, and conversational rhythm, along with casual form, illustrate the poet's message that the childhood experience of picking berries holds a deeper metaphor for life, that a childish hope continues to exist despite the continual slap of reality.

The casual and childish hopefulness in the poem is clearly enlivened in the conversational tone, forced by the irregular sentence structure found within the rhythm and the slant rhyme usage throughout the work. By organizing sentences in such a way that peremptoriness of stressed and unstressed syllables, the narrative tale of berry-picking is seen in a casual light. The additional use of slant rhyme or off rhyme ("sweet/it" 5-6) adds to the elimination of the sing-song feel that so often causes distraction of the reader in the poem. The poem's form in an AAB... rhyme scheme separated into almost rhyming couplets keep a sense of organized structure throughout.

The use of descriptive, consistent-filled diction is as juicy as the blackberries in the story; this description adds not only to the literal childish experience of berry-picking but also to the adult acknowledgement of the significance of the experience. The clear imagery of the berries’ "flesh" (5) smothered "like thickened wine" (6) brings vivid images and striking comparisons between the berry flesh and human flesh filled with "Summer’s blood" (6). The fact that the memory of the adult, reflecting back upon the childhood experience is so strong as to render all of the "mill cans; pea ting; lamb jam pots" (9) provides an additional link through repetitive diction to the metaphor that is to come. Imagery is also solidified through such literary elements as consonance "ticked and picked" (12) alliteration "big dark blobs burned" (14) and personification as it is "hunger(2) that sent the children out to gather all of the berries.

Through the childhood experience of gathering berries the speaker uses literary elements to show the deeper metaphor for idealistic hope and its survival despite realistic confines. The structure of the poem, by separating the initial tale of the berry picking into 8 couples and the reflection upon the fermentation and rot into 4 couples, indicates the speaker's belief that the childish, innocent hope for sweetness and goodness continues on. This is paradoxically established further in the speaker's description of "all the lovely, colorful smell of riot" (13) as the hopes of sweet, lovely blackberries are destroyed by the inevitable natural decay of what was sweet and good in the berries. This grim picture of the natural decay and destruction of the things we cherish enough to go search after even "where briars scratched (10) and when "our hands were peppered with thorn pricks" (16-16), presents a depressing image of the world around us. We sacrifice for the "lust for picking" (7-8) and are yet denied the fruits of our labor. This destruction of what people materialistically search for, however, does offer hope. Although the human possessions do not keep forever, the hope that nature's goodness will continue on is mirrored in the childish hope that the berries will keep despite the knowledge that the berries themselves will rot.

More important than actually saving the berries then is the value placed on nature and the triumph in the berry-pick. The fact that the berries were picked every year despite the knowledge that they would spoil is the finishing touch on the role that hope has in our society.

The ideals of natural preservation, although tainted by inevitable decay of what is worked for are perpetuated not by the physical salvation of nature's goods but by the internal value that is placed on nature. For "Blackberry Picking," the adult reflection upon the childhood innocence of that hope is reflected poignantly by the lush descriptions and imagery of a memory that in some way, means true to us all.
In the poem "Blackberry-Picking," a deeper understanding of life's ceaseless cycles is conveyed as the poem shifts from lustful and unsatisfied to disappointed and destitute. The poem was divided into two sections. The first one physically described the fall's harvest of blackberries while it symbolically described life. The vigour and youthful air given to the poem was inherent through the poet's diction. The blackberries were vividly described using strong visual, and tactile images such as "glutted purple clot" (3) "red, gun, hand as a knot" (4) and "big dark bunches burned" (14). The repetition of "b's" in line 14 further emphasizes the importance of the chosen words, and strengthens the language. The poem's liveliness and freshness of the poem was portrayed through similes and metaphors. Phrases such as "its flesh was sweet / like thickened wine; summer's blood was in it" (lines 5-6) make references to a physical body, the words 'flesh' and 'blood' in particularly. The simile "like thickened wine" draws images of drunkeness, almost an irresistible force creating a "lust for/ Picking" (lines 7-8). The tone of the poem remains unsatisfied.
The second section of the poem physically describes the decay of the blackberries, yet symbolically stands as an elaboration of death. The second eighteenth-line intimates a surplus, "when the bath was filled". Strong visual descriptions of the decay were used, such as "rot-grey vineries" (19) and "awful obduracy" with "stinking" (20) and "lovely canfuls smelt of rot" (23). The poet "always felt like crying" (22) and "hoped they'd keep, knew they would not" (24). He was trying to defy life's natural cycles while knowing he was powerless against them. The poem's second half was disappointing, desolate and full of false hope. The overall contrast between life and death of the blackberries, with the poet's powerlessness over natural cycles are what combine to convey a deeper understanding of the whole experience. A powerful rhyming comparison was drawn through the lively "clot" (3) and "knot" (4) at the end of these lines, and the words "rot" (23) and "not" (24) at the end of the last two lines. 'Rot' and 'not' are strong negative influences on the poem, whereas 'clot' and 'knot' are positive influences. A sharp contrast is drawn, further emphasizing and strengthening the overall understanding portrayed in the poem.
Seamus Heaney's poem "Blackberry-Picking" conveys more than just a literal description of the process of harvesting blackberries. Through the form and structure of the poem, and through the author's choice of words and metaphors, a deeper exploration of the experience is attained. The process of blackberry harvesting is shown as a deep psychological process of love and loss.

The poem is divided into two sections. This division separates the feelings of love in the first part from the feelings of loss in the second part. The poem describes the process of picking the blackberries in the first stanza. This is the longer of the two stanzas, illustrating the long, labor-intensive harvest driven by love. The second stanza is about the fermentation of the blackberries soon after picking them. This stanza is short because the berries rot quickly after they have been picked. This poem structure contrasts the long labors of love and the short time in which all can be lost.

The diction in the poem also contributes to its deeper meaning. While the author describes the picking, he uses certain words and phrases which demonstrate the love of blackberry harvesting.

"Like thickened wine: summer's blood was in it/
Leaving stains upon the tongue, and lust for picking (lines 6-8). This statement describes the joy and fulfillment the author finds through the picking, because of the use of the words “lust”, and “thickened wine.” The diction in the second stanza changes to show the loss felt when the berries ferment, words such as “glutting” (line 19) and “shivering” (line 20), and the phrase, “I always felt like crying” (line 22) show this sad tone. The author's words and phrases between the first and second stanza once again convey a the deeper psychological feelings associated with picking black berries.

Finally, the metaphors of the poem also show the love and loss of the process. The author describes the taste of the first berry as “sweet like thickened wine.” (lines 5-6). This metaphor is a clear statement of the love involved through the description of the taste. The loss involved is once again portrayed in the second stanza, through metaphors. The author compares the moldy blackberries to “rat-grey fungus.” (line 19)
This comparison shows the once delicious, “wonderful” berries, have been ruined.
The poem portrays blackberry-picking as more than just a simple labor. It was a deeper experience of love and anticipation followed by sadness and a sense of loss.
Question 1

Sample A

Doubtless there are other essays that convey the poem's meaning in a more compelling fashion than this essay manages — or that supply fuller readings of the rich imagery and diction found in "Blackberry-Picking." However, this is one whale of an essay! So much information is provided by this lengthy piece that it seems perverse to fault the essay because of a vexing omission or dubious assertion ("casual form," for instance?). The expertise as well as the ambition of the writer is apparent from the outset with the sophisticated technical observations about syntax, rhyme, and meter. If these comments do not hold up to scrutiny in their entirety, we forgive the lapses and credit the attempt, amazed at what the writer has accomplished! (Dissection of sound effects simply does not occur in other essays to any appreciable extent.) Similarly, we overlook the several errors in writing: the subject-verb disagreement in the first sentence, for example, or the awkward syntax that results a time or two when the student tries to combine specific examples with commentary.

The student proceeds with a stunning level of analytical command. A commitment to using details to illustrate points is obvious, and the writer has impressive facility with the vocabulary appropriate to literary criticism. Furthermore, the essay reflects an innate sensitivity to the speaker's tone by suggesting the complex tensions between enthusiasm and disappointment, joy and pain, life and death that persist throughout "Blackberry-Picking." The writer notes the separation between the two parts of the poem as a function of form and content — the second segment brings overwhelming confirmation of the appalling futility of the effort to "hoard" the berries. However, he or she understands that the language that describes the boy's eager blackberry-picking experiences in the first section incorporates the seasoned reaction of the adult: disappointment is inherent in the boyish hope the young writer describes with such conviction.

Even when the student lacks precision in an explanation, he or she does not superimpose "higher meanings" upon the literal images and actions of the poem, but renders meaning as integral to the language and various poetic elements that create and convey it. In sum, both the poet and the young critic who writes so ably about Heaney's artistry view with compassion the ongoing nature of the human struggle to stay the unstayable. The student's full embrace of the joy and exuberance conveyed in the blackberry struggle is inspiring evidence of his or her own youthful enthusiasm for life — and for poetry. The mature regard for the natural law of decline and death is similarly impressive. Imagine what he or she might do with a second — or third — draft of this essay!

Sample B

This essay is much less multi-dimensional than the very rich one provided by the first young writer, and more is suggested and implied than fully developed in its discussion. The student seems to intuit the strengths of the poem, but fails to describe its artistry with clarity or sustained
Question 1 (cont.)

This student of course deserves no points for spelling, though scorers recognize that in a normal compositional mode, the computer's spell-check would save the writer. Probably we are more forgiving of such errors than we used to be, but unquestionably the essay's virtues must be looked upon to compensate for such apostasy. The compactness of the two-paragraph approach (one paragraph devoted to each segment of the poem) seems less than efficient here. The complex point of view of the poem is ignored in the basic contrast that the essay emphasizes between the living berries and the fermenting product.

Nonetheless, there are strengths. The writer clearly senses the inherent losses built into the doomed effort to sustain the vitality of the blackberry-picking experience or, indeed, the blackberries themselves. Several apt comments focusing on diction and imagery deserve reward. Although many observations lack full development, and the references to the poet's techniques seem arbitrary rather than systematic, the student takes pains to make suggestions about the power of the poem's language, even to honoring its aural effects. Notably, the discussion of the rhyming words (clot, knot, rot, not) provides important support to the student's argument about the essential contrasts between life and death that he or she feels are the poet's preoccupation and concern.

Sample C

This student got the word on the five-paragraph essay and dutifully pulled off a focused piece tracking "love and loss." The essay boasts an introduction that is more than a restatement of the question; three paragraphs highlighting form, diction, and metaphor; and a conclusion that in spite of its brevity serves to reassert the thesis that has been doggedly, if incompletely, developed. However, there is very little analysis in this piece, though enough to push it into the upper half. Several minor errors (such as the misuse of "it's") also blight the effort.

The contrast between love and loss oversimplifies the conflicts and tensions in the poem, but it is not wrong. However, the writer provides justifications for the lengths of the stanzas that are forced; and the assertions made in reference to the phrases that describe "the love of blackberry harvesting" prove all but unconvincing. (Perhaps "love" and "thickened wine" are naturally linked, but the connection is not clear from the remarks here.) Readers of this essay may also be uncomfortable with the cavalier identification of the speaker as "the author."

Although the writer of this essay seemed to respond to the fundamental tension in the poem, his or her understanding and discussion of the poet's artistic strategy is limited to essentially problematic observations. Thus the tidy ordering of this essay cannot compensate for its limited content. Though the writer is competent to sense multiple levels of meaning in this poem and to shape a coherent essay, albeit formulaic, this piece does less than the other two essays to explain the power of the poem.